REGENERATING RESISTANCE

The Alliance Building Legacy of Greg Morozumi

We continue to celebrate the legacy of Greg Morozumi.

As an activist, cultural organizer, artist, teacher and mentor, Greg has been a pillar to cultural movements and grassroots community organizing in the Bay Area for decades. Staying true to the belief that culture is a weapon in the struggle for liberation, Greg has led and organized Third World cultural movements laying the foundation for institutions like EastSide Arts Alliance.

Through archival material pulled from Community Archival Resource Project (CARP), an archive of third world history founded by Greg, this zine - inspired by the exhibition that took place August 20 to September 16th, 2023 - showcases artwork, essays, photographs, newspapers, political buttons, and postcards that speak to Greg's legacy of building alliances amongst third world communities and leading with heart, power, and culture.

Regeneration

...something like a chant we constantly hear from Greg. This is for the next generation - what are we giving them and how are they using it?

It's critical to have the next generation always a part of everything at EastSide – from sitting at our collective table, to teaching, performing, learning.

Our archive, Community Archival Resource Project, is here so the next crew of revolutionary artists and freedom fighters know the continuum they are a part of.

“If you want to integrate with the people and understand where the grassroots are coming from, culture is the main avenue for doing that.”

-Greg Morozumi,
Manufacturing Dissent, Third Force, July/August 1993

Greg Morozumi came up surrounded by political discussions, books and music. Many thanks first to his parents who instilled in him the love of learning, questioning, and working for justice. The Vietnam War and the particular irony of Black and Brown soldiers killing Asians fighting for their own self-determination compelled Greg to immerse himself in understanding these conflicts and looking to teachers who placed the whole discussion in the context of U.S. imperialism. Greg maintains an anti-imperialist worldview.

An unrelenting organizer, Greg specifically considers himself a cultural organizer - shaping movements that change the consciousness of our communities. He embraces the power of art to educate and liberate. Greg's decades of work with Amiri Baraka, Malaquías Montoya, and Yuri Kochiyama fuel his own passion to dedicate his life to political struggle.

EastSide Arts Alliance came to be because of Greg's understanding that the solidarity of Third World people is how we will claim the power to determine our own destinies. Working in our neighborhood of East Oakland, his vision was to help create a permanent institution where the stories and cultures of our neighborhood – Southeast Asian, Black, Latinx and Indigenous would prevail. Through visual art, music, theater, dance, poetry, and townhall forums we would learn from each other and see where there were points of unity. We recognized that we all were subjected to white supremacist and exploitative capitalist agendas that resulted in our communities being taken advantage of, flooded with crack and police, and pretty much left to disintegrate.

Through cultural institutions, like EastSide Cultural Center, folks found a trusted place to share truths and build power together to affect real, systemic change. Greg recognizes how powerful artists are.

Artists' work takes us to another place, helps us to imagine different worlds and different ways to get there.

They can teach – making history come alive through music, theater and visual arts. No movement is possible without artists.

“Community-based arts programs should be recognized as a critical part of the resistance, and particularly focused on youth of color for the cultivation of creative new ideas and fresh leadership. They are the most inclined to build bridges between communities of color...”

-Greg Morozumi,

Building Alliance Through Community Arts, Shades of Power Newsletter, 2000

Greg is always teaching. He does this mostly through sharing - sharing food, books, music, buttons... He shares knowledge with us all. Today's struggle is how to get folks to read. Inundated by so much social media, with 3 second bites bombarding our consciousness at all times it's next to impossible to have the focused time for study, contemplation and discussion. Greg's idea - open bookstore:

Bandung Books!

Bandung Books is a Third World bookstore named after the Bandung Conference that took place in Indonesia in 1955, ushering in what became known as the Bandung Era. The significance was that African and Asian countries came together for the first time as a block that was not dominated by the U.S. and Western Europe. By the end of that decade, the continents of Africa, Asia, and Latin America became known as the "Third World." This anti-colonialism Third World coalition building is what Eastside's work is dedicated to.

EastSide's community archive, CARP, initially brought together with much of his own archive, is the foundation of Greg's work as an educator and the foundation on which all of EastSide's work is built. The driving force of the archives is that we have to understand how we got here in order to know what to do next. It's critical that we know and understand struggles that came before us and how folks organized to change systems.

Young people today addressing issues such as police and prisons must know about previous campaigns such as the efforts around the shooting of Eleanor Bumpurs, an abolitionist movement that Greg was a part of in NYC in the 1980s. Folks working for progressive systemic change today are a part of a continuum of freedom fighters that help inspire and guide our work. Greg is committed to making sure we have access to these stories. He is especially dedicated to sharing knowledge with artists because it will show up in their work and make the job of passing on this information that much easier.

Greg is an innate artist who creates through multiple mediums - his sketches, altars, screenprints, and collages are just a few examples. Many folks don't even know this about him - he would much rather we focus on other artists such as Emory Douglas, Andres Cisneros, & Elizabeth Catlett.

His decades-long work as a curator, for the Asian Resource Gallery and EastSide, exemplifies the integration of Greg's artistry and his role as an educator, as he would often use his gallery exhibits to sharpen our understanding of current political struggles and their historical predecessor.

His spirit is that of an artist. This is why he understood how critical art is - the beauty of the music of David Murray being able to sustain us. The poster art of our annual Malcolm X Jazz Arts Festival as something that inspires us. The poetry of Sonia Sanchez as a rallying call to incite us.

Greg brings his artist's understanding to every single meeting, rally, reading, townhall, concert, and discussion and it has been a foundation in every single facet of EastSide's work.
